

And should we give a "value" to nature?

“Progress can be a great comfort. But beyond a certain threshold, it becomes uncomfortable and even unlivable. Unlivable at the existential level, because it gives the image of a dead world, dumb, disenchanted, asphyxiating in the long term. And unlivable at a more concrete level: by inducing climate change and a biodiversity crisis, this will make the world uninhabitable for humans in the decades to come. The question is therefore to relearn how to pay attention, to connect one's sensitivity to the multiplicity of life forms which inhabit an environment, which constitute it but in a discreet way, pollinators, soil fauna, forests...”(Ed Begley Jr)
